AMERICAN PSYCHOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION (APA)

This handout is adapted from the 6th edition of the Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association (2009).

Two elements contribute documenting your sources in APA: 1) a References page after the text of the document giving the publication information for your sources and 2) in-text parenthetical citations that refer to the reference page so that your readers know which information comes from which source. In essence, these two elements work together as a matching tool.

The References page is an alphabetical and specifically formatted list of sources cited in the text. The purpose of having a reference page in an APA document is so others can clearly see and access what sources you use in your text. The validity of your own work will be affected by certain factors listed in your Reference page. For example, if you use sources published several decades ago, your research may be outdated, or if you use sources created by people who are not considered to be leaders in the field, your work will have less authority. In contrast, using the most recent research and publications from authors who are experts and citing this information will allow your readers to know that you are a credible author.

NOTE: If you are required to list all the sources you have read relating to your text, even if you do not cite the sources inside the text itself, the list is called a Bibliography, a bibliography differs from a reference page in that the bibliography includes all material that influenced your writing and thinking, whereas the reference page only shows what materials you refer to within your text.)

This handout demonstrates a shortened "how to" version of creating a references page as well as citing those sources within the work.
Section 1: Creating a Reference Page
Section 2: Citing Sources within the Text

Section 1: Creating a Reference Page

List sources alphabetically by the author's last name. If the author of a source is unknown, alphabetize the source by the first major word of the title (ignore the articles "A," "An," and "The"). Begin the list of references after the text of your paper but before any appendices and/or notes. Continue the consecutive numbering of your pages.
